Doctors Held to Higher Standards

Some doctors have questioned why they are held to higher standards than some other nonhealthcare professionals. One reason is the “fiduciary” nature of the doctor/patient relationship—doctors are required and have a duty to make decisions in the best interest of their patients, not themselves.

Those who aid others typically are held at the highest end of social standing. With this elevated status comes added fiduciary responsibilities: Lawmakers and the public expect healthcare providers to conform to the highest moral and ethical standards.

Doctors also are more accountable due to the intimate nature of the doctor/patient relationship. Patients need to be able to trust their healthcare providers. Without this trust, many patients would not share certain facts about themselves that would enable proper care and treatment. The fact that a patient is frequently at the mercy of a doctor’s decision causes an inequity in the distribution of power in the doctor/patient relationship.

Boundary Violations Can be Unintentional

Many doctors are surprised to learn that the patient—not the doctor—sets the boundaries, and a doctor’s statements or actions can be perceived differently than how the doctor intended them. It does not matter what you intended. If your patient felt offended, there was a boundary violation.

In addition, chiropractors may be at greater risk due to the unique nature of the chiropractic profession. It’s more hands-on than many other healthcare specialties and, because chiropractors often treat the same patients over many years, the doctor/patient relationship tends to become more familiar. As a result, D.C.s tend to develop excellent rapport with their patients, and while this is a testament to the profession, doctors need to be careful not to compromise the professional aspect of their relationships with patients.

Finally, another important issue is how judges and juries might view a doctor’s behavior. Keep in mind that these individuals may look at a D.C.’s actions several years later, with 20/20 hindsight and preconceived notions about what actually transpired.

Documentation and Record Keeping

Most complaints require the Board to subpoena patient records. Frequently, poor documentation is discovered when reviewing a patient’s records. The original complaint may not involve a documentation issue, or the Board may find no evidence to support the allegation made. However, poor documentation may result in Board intervention or disciplinary action against you.

Keep your documentation skills up to date and avoid Board scrutiny. Remember, Clinical Documentation is an approved CE topic. If you still need to earn CE to renew your license for 2020, now is the perfect time to improve your record keeping and documentation!
